

The Two-Column Log

AVA Fixture Studio / English / 2026-09-28

1. Across the Harbour

Mira opens the harbour log before sunrise. The printed page has two columns, but her account follows one journey. She reads every line on the left before moving to the right.

The folded chart begins beside the first window and continues across the narrow gutter into the right column, where the keeper has drawn a small circle around the safe landing.

The keeper calls the marked route a passage^[1]. Its explanation appears beneath the illustration on the next page.

A bell ends the first watch. This sentence belongs after the marked route, even if the PDF stores its letters earlier.

Across the full-width heading

The heading spans both columns and begins a new reading band. Mira finishes this left-hand paragraph before she crosses to the paragraph at its right. The earlier right column must not be interleaved with it.

The last entry on this page describes a letter carried over the harbour wall and follows it onto the next printed page, where Mira places the letter beside the lamp and checks that every sentence is still present.

She marks the passage^[1] again. This second callout returns to a different place in the same chapter.

The right column completes the approach to the windows. Only after this paragraph does the wide figure enter the reading order. The figure and its caption belong together.

A map between the columns

Figure D1. Four windows across the harbour.

Below the caption, the prose returns to the left column. The first blue window marks the beginning of the landing.

The lower right paragraph follows the lower left paragraph. Mira then reads the shared note before closing the harbour chapter.

[1] A passage is the safe route across the water in this invented account. Both harbour callouts refer to this one explanation.

2. Back to the Gate

The next chapter begins with ordinary English prose in two columns. Its note numbering starts again, while the note identity remains separate from the harbour explanation.

At the gate, a second keeper records the return^[1]. This callout belongs to chapter two, not to the earlier passage note.

The upper right column confirms the order of events. Mira reached the landing, crossed the town, and finally arrived at the gate. A mixed source still contains this complete paragraph.

The return journey

After the spanning heading, the reading stream starts again at the left edge. All words remain in their original order when the book reflows onto a narrow screen.

The last right-hand paragraph ends the journey. A finished EPUB needs no artificial newspaper columns to preserve this sequence.

[1] The return means the keeper has reached the gate again. This chapter-local note must never merge with the earlier note also numbered one.